These two datacenters are completely separate from each other and not connected directly. The WAN is a "public IP" (like it's a WIFI that gives access to Internet). When a user connects from a client at the "second" datacenter to the router, it will get an access to the Internet. Now I'd like to route certain things from the client, based on its MAC address, from the router (the "Internet router") to the "second" datacenter. At the "second" datacenter, there is a data center router. I don't want to give access from the "second" datacenter to the Internet, but I'd like to give access to the WAN IP (router) of the "second" datacenter to the second datacenter (the data center router). I hope this is not really confusing, but basically the WAN is the bridge between the two datacenters and I just want to let the "second" datacenter access certain interfaces (routers, so their own data center network), without giving them access to the "Internet". I don't know how this works. Can someone please help me figure out the steps of the WAN (IP, port, rules, etc)? There is no firewalls, DNS, load balancer, etc in this scenario. I'm using plain IP addresses and ports. I also don't need NAT for this. A: That's exactly what a NAT (Network Address Translation) device is for. See "what is NAT" on Wikipedia, or search your favorite search engine for "what is NAT". The NAT device will be placed in between the router and the
