For some reason, the mitochondrial organelles divide before the nucleus. The nucleus is more condensed. The spindle fibers are all connecting to the centrosome and are not longer aligned in parallel. The structure of the chromosome has some big differences as well. In particular the centromeres, the points to which the spindle fibers attach to separate the chromosomes. Basically, it looks like the organism has learned new things about the cell, and it is not a model. However, there is one fact that I haven't discussed before that might be a clue to why the organism has learned about the cell: Some of the cell's chromosomes are broken: Note that the chromosome 1 is missing a part of the centromere, and chromosome 2 has two centromeres, one smaller than the other. This is the cell's way of copying itself, because the cell doesn't want to spend energy to make two copies of the centromeres. Now, a good model will have two centromeres! That is the rule that makes biology so exciting: nature doesn't make mistakes. So
