Robotic systems may be used to handle, move, place, and extract a variety of different items, including tools and/or workpieces. For example, robotic systems may be used to move workpieces into, out of, and/or within a manufacturing facility. For example, workpieces may be sent by a robot to a manufacturing line in a packaging line. The workpieces may be placed in a processing station or on a conveyor belt to be processed by a robot. After being processed, the workpieces may be placed in a shipping container and/or sent to a warehouse or to a retailer. There may be a variety of different types of items that require processing in an automated robotic system. Some items may be particularly difficult to process with an automated robotic system, such as fluid-containing items, items that include liquids, and fragile items. Some items, such as components of a larger device, may be too heavy to be handled by an automated robotic system on their own. In addition, some processing of items may require highly accurate positioning of the items. In addition, some items may contain hazardous materials, which may be harmful to people or other devices, and/or disposed of improperly. For example, an item containing a liquid may be harmful to people who subsequently handle the item. Also, the proper disposal of a liquid-containing item may be important to ensure the safe handling of the liquid. Traditionally, in order to move workpieces and process items, an operator must position the workpiece or item on a device. The operator must then manually position a tool or piece of equipment to

Q: java.lang.NoSuchMethodError: android.support.v7.internal.widget.ActionMenuView.hasOverflowMenu I've got the error java.lang.NoSuchMethodError: android.support.v7.internal.widget.ActionMenuView.hasOverflowMenu on one of my project's libs. It was working fine few days ago but now it throws this exception. Has anybody got the same issue or have a hint? I'm using Android Studio (1.2.2) and the latest SDK. Thanks in advance!

A: It's a bug in the Support library. It has been fixed with version 29.1.0. (see:
