The neighborhood's kids are back in school, and so are the bees. Honeybees are among the most familiar insects in the world, but a lot of people don't know much about their lives. This is especially true of honeybees in the West, which are threatened by a global phenomenon: the disappearance of flowering plants. Why? Pollen, which honeybees collect to build wax cells for storing honey, may be disappearing because of a phenomenon called "climate change." Honeybees are essential pollinators of flowering plants. They collect pollen from the male parts of plants (the stamens), and carry that pollen to the female parts (the pistils). When bees visit a flower, they often pick up pollen from the male parts, then they take it to a specialized section of a bee's body, the pollen basket, and deposit it there. The pollen grains (or pollen load) are usually then collected into a ball-like structure called a "pollen patty" and stored in the queen bee's abdomen. In the case of a honeybee, she carries the pollen back to the hive, and mixes it with the honey she has collected from flowers. Honeybees use the pollen and honey to feed their babies. Honeybees, in turn, make food for us in the process of pollination. They do this by providing a valuable service to us: helping to grow plants that we can eat. That's why, in the United States, honeybees are classified as "beneficial insects." Climate change Flowering plants produce the majority of the food we eat. Most of these plants produce fruit, and those fruits are part of the food we eat. But flowering plants can also produce pollen, and pollination is also essential to the food chain. Most flowering plants rely on a process called "automixis," in which the plant contains genes that allow

What's New in the AppsBox?

What would you like to do today? Just like a personal assistant, AppsBox constantly runs in the background and helps you get things done by adding the most important applications to your desktop, without any manual actions required from you. It keeps track of applications you have installed, and it can remember where they are located. You can choose to start or stop AppsBox manually, and it can also be run as a service, if you prefer. Category manager: Easily organize your shortcuts in categories Just like the name suggests, AppsBox offers you the chance to group your applications into categories, which you can access by pressing the shortcut key "a" on your keyboard. You can add up to 20 shortcuts in any category, and they can be moved, resized and repositioned by dragging them. The layout of the categories and the dimensions of the icons can be customized, and there are plenty of icons available for numerous popular programs. Tools: Show, hide and remove shortcuts with a single click In case you are in need of a particular application and have no idea where it is installed, you can use AppsBox to search for it. The utility keeps a backup of the original shortcut information, which can be restored if it gets lost. AppsBox can also display a list of all installed applications, and you can easily remove the ones that you no longer use. Service: Set AppsBox to start automatically upon system boot AppsBox can also be set to automatically start at system startup. It can be easily turned on or off through the "S" key on your keyboard, and it can be set to run in the foreground or in the background. You can also add AppsBox to the system tray and control it by pressing a combination of keys on your keyboard. Pros: The program supports Windows 10 and Windows 8.1. There are plenty of icon sets available. AppsBox can be set to run in the foreground or in the background. The tool offers robust search capabilities. Cons: The category manager is closed after writing a new entry. AppsBox lacks some useful features, such as the option of putting it in the system tray. Like all utilities that work as secondary desktops, AppsBox needs to be displayed in full-screen mode. 4.0 Description: An 8-year-old software developer has released yet another cool program to the public: Delicious Button. Since the launch of the program last year, it has taken the world by storm. With the program, you can add text, images, and videos to your web pages without leaving your browser.
