Brushing the teeth effectively is an important aspect of maintaining a healthy dental health. Traditional oral hygiene implements, like dental floss and dental picks, can be difficult to manipulate when interdental spaces and/or areas between teeth are tight. Brushing the teeth effectively is also difficult for people with arthritis and other arthritic conditions of the hand. Therefore, there is a need for a personal oral hygiene device for manipulating an oral hygiene implement, for expelling an oral care composition from the oral hygiene implement, and for brushing the teeth effectively, that provides improved control for people having arthritis or other arthritic conditions of the hand and provides ease of use. Successful caspase-independent intrinsic apoptosis is triggered by the MIM domain of the transcription factor Pax-4. Pax-4 belongs to the Pax gene family of transcription factors and can function as a tumor suppressor. Although the physical interaction of Pax-4 and Bax has been suggested to underlie its tumor suppression function, the molecular mechanisms responsible for the apoptosis-inducing function of Pax-4 have remained unclear. In this study, we have investigated the apoptosis-inducing activity of Pax-4 in MCF-7 breast cancer cells. Our results indicate that a Pax-4 fusion protein containing the DNA-binding domain alone (V27) is incapable of triggering cell death. However, a construct with a C-terminal region containing an intrinsically disordered motif (MIM) derived from the N-terminal region was found to be sufficient to cause apoptosis. Interestingly, the apoptosis was independent of caspase activation and was associated with Bid cleavage. To further investigate the underlying mechanism of the MIM, we carried out a proteomic screen that identified FADD/CASP8 DED as one of the MIM-binding proteins. The interaction of the DED with the MIM was confirmed by mutational analyses. Co-
