The technology has been introduced to let players experience the excitement of gameplay in “theaters of the future,” which are virtual stadiums and stadia, where players can receive a closer look at high-performance replicas of actual football stadiums, complete with all of the striking banners and flags which fans can experience at FIFA events. In a similar way, players can experience the unique and intricate challenges of “theater of the moment” competitions, which are also replicated, featuring a selection of highly realistic, locally-generated pitches and match-specific awards, which award for success and failure on the pitch. The technology also allows players to become part of a more realistic in-game experience by using motion-tracking-based rendering to provide player skins with unique footpads, ensuring that they move with their unique player characteristics, allowing them to react and perform in ways which make more sense and mirror actual athletes during a match. This tech also allows better AI for players and, at least for now, player models will be able to react accordingly to the conditions in the field, receiving penalties under the pressure of a game situation. Xbox Australia will be the first to get the game and details are available over on Xbox.com.
