Flagfox displays a flag image within the address bar, depending on the country/region that the web server is located in. The flag image is a small PNG image downloaded from the Flagfox servers. Its purpose is to facilitate the identification of the country of origin of the web server, even though the domain name shows a different location. Moreover, when you access a page that's located in a different country, Flagfox displays a flag indicating its origin. The flag information is retrieved from the Country Codes GeoList service, which consists of a database of country codes and country names for every country in the world. Currently, the database includes 75.568 countries, which means the addon has a lot of coverage. Flagfox is also able to automatically update the flag for the targeted country every time you access a new page. Some countries will still show a flag with a white rectangle in place of the flag image, since Country Codes GeoList is not updated for some countries yet. Please also note that certain cookies are required by Country Codes GeoList, which are sent to Flagfox's servers. While Country Codes GeoList is a free service, Flagfox is supported by a donation. If you enjoy the addon and find it useful, you may consider supporting us via the donate button on the options page (just next to the addon's name). Can not log out from my account (I read the FAQ), I am the only one who can log on. The addon uses service to search country flags. This addon flags the country of the server, too. What are web site look up tools? If you surf to the web from a computer or a mobile phone, then you've probably seen a simple, small icon appearing next to the URL that you type into your browser. This tells you the geographical location of the server that is actually hosting the website you are visiting. The colour of the icon indicates the country of origin, which is generally a good indicator of the overall website's security. For example, a green, dot-shaped globe means it is hosted in Australia, a blue globe means you are visiting a site hosted in Germany, a yellow globe indicates the server's country of origin is Canada, and so on. The actual country of origin (or top level domain, or tld) is hidden behind this icon, and a simple search for the domain's name in the search engine of your choice reveals this information. A domain name is just one way of identifying a website on the Internet. There are other important methods. For example, a web server knows the name of its customers, and sends this information, along with the website's IP address (the Internet's equivalent of a physical address) to search engines when you access a website. These search engines collect the address and use it to help sort the results. So, websites located in the same country or city tend to appear at the same point on the list, while websites located in other countries are often more distant from each other. Web servers can also be used as a proxy when you access a website, effectively changing your point of origin to the web server's IP address. In a study in 44 children aged 5-12 y, an analytical method was established to measure all urinary sterol fractions, which are products of cholesterol absorption, in a single 24-h urine specimen. More than 6 h was required for complete extraction of sterols. Although the individual urinary sterol fractions correlated poorly with one another ($r = 0.35-0.54$) a clear separation of the different sterol fractions was achieved by principal components analysis. The absorption of cholesterol was highly ($r = 0.91$) and significantly correlated with urinary sterol excretion over the whole range of dietary intake (19-65 g/d). Moreover, absorption of cholesterol increased with increasing dietary cholesterol intake ($r = 0$).
