2 Aug Do you remember all those sleepless nights spent fighting Black Dragons and Archangels, Demons and Necromancers? Heroes of Might & Magic .Q: I have a question about passing a class type that includes private variables. I don't understand what is going wrong in the following code. #include #include struct myClass { int a; double b; myClass(int _a=1, double _b=2) : a(_a), b(_b) {} }; int main() { myClass _c(3,4); return 0; } Here there are no problems compiling it. But when i pass in as a function argument a class that contains private variables it gives a compile error. error C2440: 'initializing' : cannot convert from 'int' to 'myClass' What is the problem? A: Your syntax is off. You need a constructor initializer list: myClass(int a = 1, double b = 2) : a(a), b(b) {} ^ | + Also, since you don't have a class destructor, there is no problem calling it. There is a small problem with that, however: The compiler probably will issue a warning about this (Microsoft is pretty good at warning about such things). The destructor of a std::string can be called (in fact, it is called automatically). You can disable the
