A total of 8 of the 35 dogs examined in Macao showed eggs of Schistosoma mansoni; the eggs were only found in urine in the faeces. It is suggested that the dogs are the first intermediate host of S. mansoni in Macao. The infected dogs may serve as a source of schistosomiasis for the Macao residents. Canine schistosomiasis should be given greater attention. Femoral nerve stretch injury in the treatment of adductor longus tendon is often the second largest tendon of the thigh, often acting as a strong adductor muscle of the thigh in sporting movements. There is a growing body of evidence to suggest that the adductor longus tendon may act as a key part of the gluteus medius tendon. One of the most popular treatments for adductor longus tendinopathy is the use of transcutaneous femoral nerve stimulation (TFNS), however this treatment has not been previously reported in the literature. This case report demonstrates the use of TFNS in conjunction with rest, physical therapy and a rehabilitation programme to treat adductor longus tendinopathy. The improvement in symptoms was satisfactory for the patient and the changes were maintained at the time of follow-up at 6 months post treatment. We have also found TFNS to be cost effective and safe in the treatment of this condition. It is postulated that TFNS may
