Mycobacterium tuberculosis specifically down-regulates TNF-alpha and IL-10 in human monocytes. The interactions between mycobacteria and the immune system are controlled by a finely tuned balance between pro- and anti-inflammatory cytokines. In this study, we show that M. tuberculosis activates human monocytes to produce high levels of TNF-alpha and low levels of IL-10. The absence of IL-10 does not impair the ability of monocytes to produce TNF-alpha but it results in a decreased level of TNF-alpha produced. Furthermore, IL-10 reduces the secretion of TNF-alpha in response to TLR2, TLR4 and TLR3 ligation. We show that these effects are not due to TNF-alpha blocking, but are mediated by the combined activities of IL-10 and IFN-gamma. Therefore, we postulate that by modulating the level of TNF-alpha and IL-10, M. tuberculosis has evolved to selectively affect the immunoregulatory mechanisms of activated macrophages.'
