1. Field of the Invention
The present invention relates to a level comparator circuit for a microcomputer, and more particularly, it relates to a level comparator circuit capable of providing an output in an operable state at a low power consumption.

2. Description of the Related Art
An example of a conventional level comparator circuit of this type is illustrated in FIG. 1. This level comparator circuit is designed as a comparator circuit which compares a voltage $V_{sub.in}$ (representing the voltage level of an input signal) and a predetermined reference voltage $V_{sub.ref}$. A reference voltage supply circuit 1 is constituted by a reference voltage generating circuit 1a and a boot capacitor 1b. The reference voltage $V_{sub.ref}$ is thus applied to an input terminal of the comparator circuit. A common voltage supply circuit 2 is constituted by a P-channel MOS transistor $Q_{sub.P}$ and a boot capacitor 2a. The P-channel MOS transistor $Q_{sub.P}$ is connected between the reference voltage supply circuit 1 and a power supply $V_{sub.EE}$. The P-channel MOS transistor $Q_{sub.P}$ is turned on when the power supply $V_{sub.EE}$ becomes higher than the ground potential $V_{sub.SS}$ and off when the power supply $V_{sub.EE}$ becomes lower than the ground potential $V_{sub.SS}$. The boot capacitor 2a serves to protect the P-channel MOS transistor $Q_{sub.P}$ from destruction by a rise in the power supply $V_{sub.EE}$. An inverter circuit 3 is connected to the output terminal of the comparator circuit. The inverter circuit 3 inverts the output of the comparator circuit and provides an output from the inverter circuit 3 as an output signal $V_{sub.out}$.
