High power laser sources can be considered for delivery as some UV energy is required for porphyrin synthesis and some thermal energy for protein inactivation. The surface area of the target plays an important role in the loading of porphyrin and nucleic acids. In this study we coated the coupons with porphyrins using a shorter treatment time (15 min) than was used in previous studies ([@bib0075], [@bib0145]). In a previous study the lower surface area of titanium compared to glass may have affected the ability to load porphyrins. For the laser treated samples the amount of porphyrins on glass was higher than that on titanium, probably due to the different surface properties of the materials. There was no difference in transfection with the naked nucleic acid on titanium and glass. This is consistent with previous studies that showed that titanium has a similar level of transfection compared to glass ([@bib0145]). However, after the laser treatment, the titanium samples exhibited a significant increase in transfection, whilst the glass samples did not. Some of the potential reasons
