Other Side of Fear It was extremely hard to keep my foot on the ground as I laid down this afternoon. Floating up like the beautiful and fun balloon animals at a birthday party, I know this is truly no surprise to anyone who has ever had to go through a health scare. A major, unexpected event has you staring at your nurse's face full of fear and dismay. You're holding back tears as she gently holds you, you're trying hard not to gasp and hold your breath, but you're definitely not sitting down. What is the last place you want to be right now – your doctor's office? Why is your doctor's office the last place you want to be at this time? They don't always ask if this is good news or bad news. Sometimes they may just shrug and say, "Let's get you an MRI right away." On the other side of fear is your new normal. For some, it means life as you have known it is over; for others, it means you get to go home after an MRI and get a diagnosis and life expectancy. I found myself there this afternoon. This MRI was unexpected because I thought my knee was just "achy." I've had a knee injury that has never been a major one for the past three years. But the chronic pain and muscle weakness has been spreading to my right leg. I've seen several doctors and tried various treatments to see what might help. It was getting to the point where I couldn't even ride my bike to work. As I walked up the stairs to the doctor's office that day, I felt as if there was a hundred pound weight resting on my chest. Here we go again. The pain is now spreading to the right side, and any shifting in my weight puts me in excruciating pain. This is terrifying. I needed to know what was going on and the sooner I could get a diagnosis, the better. I had been to the doctor's office a few days ago, and he sent me to the MRI for my shoulder. I thought the MRI was going to take a few hours to complete, but it was only over an hour and a half.
