This is the Windows RealView XP(Or Vista)I just want to point out a few things. First, the update from the Unreal Engine 3.2 days at E3. Second, the information that is coming out of the Unreal Engine 3.2 private meeting that just took place. Third, the 1:30 panel by Tom Swell, CTO of Epic Games, where the normal Twitch stream audience were able to hang out for an hour with him and the Epic games staff, including the new CEO Tim Sweeney (the guy that brought us the Unreal Engine 3 and Unreal Engine 4). Quite frankly, it just goes to show you that Epic Games is a company that is listening to what people have to say, and is willing to run with the idea of what may be possible in the future, as well as giving people the tools they want to use to create their own content. Their willingness to continue doing what they do in the way that they want, instead of the way that has been done in the past (or at least for the previous decade), would suggest that they are hungry for a strong foothold in the PC developer community, and are willing to spend the time and money to help get them where they want to go. Epic Games is leading the way here. Epic games have been pulling the strings behind the scenes, with the Unreal Engine growing in popularity and usage by just about every game company, big and small, to try and build their own game engine. This is amazing news for the PC gaming industry. The PC gaming industry will survive. Only because it has reached a crossroads. The big PC developers have not been content to just develop their games on one OS that creates a proprietary environment, and then a proprietary runtime with its own set of plugins, tools, and rendering libraries. They have begun building their own game engines, and creating their own plugins and tools, and directly communicating with game developers about what they are working on. Smaller developers are catching up by creating their own SDKs for the Unreal Engine, and then playing around with their own Unreal Engine plugins. It is a
