The development of induced pluripotent stem (iPS) cells provides a unique opportunity to manipulate and improve the pluripotent state of cells in our germline. Although these cells can be generated by retroviral transduction, totipotent stem cells in both the human and mouse can be generated through genetic reprogramming. We now show that iPS cells are prone to heritable defects that have been a major limitation for the use of iPS cells in research and therapeutics. We report that the iPS cell genome is prone to accumulating more mutations than that of the soma, that the mutations arise by multiple mechanisms and are enriched for changes in repetitive sequences. Importantly, the increased mutation rate is not due to mutagenesis at the reprogramming stage. The mutations accumulate independently at the
