Roblox lets players create immersive virtual worlds and play in them using a wide variety of games, graphics, music, animation, activities, and more. It’s like Minecraft, Second Life, and Pokémon in that you can create your own settings and explore environments in a 3D space, but it’s not as restrictive as Minecraft is for building and doesn’t require a separate client to utilize it. Game developers are able to create virtual games (similar to Tetris or Bejeweled) and play them on Roblox using a block-based language called Lua that can be accessed through a tool called Studio. While Studio is still very much in development, the free version gives developers access to a large set of tools to create games in real time, with regular updates. Players can create their own unique avatar, browse the online marketplace, and play more than 800,000 experiences. They can also join private groups, message with other players, or create their own content to share with the community. For a fee, players can expand their experience further by buying premium memberships that give them game items and special features.
