Thanks anyways Biosensors for trace analysis of pharmaceuticals and environmental contaminants: a critical review. This review aims at highlighting the advances in the use of microfabricated biosensors for the detection of trace concentrations of pharmaceuticals and environmental contaminants. The main focus is placed on the analysis of pharmaceuticals in water and food using electrochemical, optical, thermal, mass spectrometric, and capillary electrophoretic detection methods. The main attention is given to a few antibiotics, antidepressants and anticonvulsants (i.e., carbamazepine, citalopram, lamotrigine, oxcarbazepine, paroxetine, phenytoin, and topiramate) and three groups of pesticides (i.e., organochlorine, organophosphorus, and pyrethroid insecticides). Methods of sample preparation and analytical conditions adopted in the reviewed studies are presented. The performance of most of the microfabricated biosensors in the real samples is evaluated, and the prospects and limitations of the biosensors in the future for pharmaceutical or environmental contaminant analysis are also discussed.
