I have a maven project (actually a submodule of a larger project), with unit tests and integration tests both. The unit tests run correctly; they are the ones that need logging. The integration tests run on a separate project; they don't need any logging. Can/should I add logging to the integration tests? Will it cause problems for my unit tests? If I don't, what are the possible consequences of this? (For example, the integration tests will log to stdout and stderr and when they fail, it will block the process). A: I'd not advice that. The reason is that your tests should be light-weight and independent. If you want to have logging for those tests you must have code for that in there as well. I would recommend that you have no logging, and just make sure the unit tests have a test adapter that tests for a blank console screen. If you use JUnit, then you
