It is characterized by a complex series of events that culminate in the formation of a stenosis or obstruction in a major blood vessel. The pathophysiological process by which atherosclerosis occurs typically begins with the collection of several different cell types within the intima layer of the vascular wall in a concentric fashion that ultimately encases the entire wall circumference. Macrophages, T-lymphocytes, and certain types of lymphocytes, as well as smooth muscle cells, are the four principle types of cells typically found within the atherosclerotic plaque. Within the last several years, it has been firmly established that plaque rupture is a primary cause of coronary occlusion. Plaque rupture may take two forms: fissuring and dissecting. Fissuring occurs when an artery plaque suffers significant internal stress, initiating a crack. Dissecting arteries display a tear in the atheroma or a sharply defined separation of the intimal and media layers, rather than a single crack. Typically, dissections occur in the region of arterial bifurcations, while fissures are more commonly associated with the carotid artery. The primary cause of plaque rupture is thought to be mechanical. Indeed, hemodynamic forces, such as high blood pressure, frictional forces associated with high shear rates, and the accumulation of macrophages and other inflammatory cells, can contribute to plaque vulnerability. Plaque rupture is thought to trigger a vascular response, which in turn can cause luminal enlargement and increase vessel wall stress. For example, the function of the endothelium is to allow the passage of material between the intima and the lumen of the artery. When the endothelium is impaired, the passage of material into the bloodstream is inhibited. This can also occur due to the formation of a stenosis within the vessel. In addition to impairing proper endothelial function, intravascular embolization can also be caused by plaque tears. Embolization can be intra-arterial (e.g., a piece of plaque is drawn into the blood stream) or extra-intramural (e.g., a piece of 6d1f23a050
