the movie is afraid to take its head out of its own shoes. it is the pop-song in filmdom. its a bollywood faustian bargain. really, it should end with 'you are bollywood, bindu.' everyone knows the ending of that story, the children, newly bratty and desperate, are willing to commit suicide to have a hit, but the future says 'bring in a director, a story and a male star. we are a hit.' this is a girl who has neglected her family responsibilities (most of her family is living with her). and its really hard to understand why she is so lacking in heart. she has a sister, half-sister and a mom who all have abandoned her. even her mail order best friend, in her own words, wasnt even really her friend, but abhis friend. so what else is she to do? she moves to bangalore to earn her bread and butter. it is clear that she is a selfish person. you see this when she behaves nonchalantly towards her best friend and college friend as they reach her house. she doesnt offer them food or coffee. she doesnt even greet her very first co-worker who is her boss. her boss just tells her that her pay has been slashed, doesnt even mention that she is ill. she doesnt even tell her mom that she has been diagnosed with cancer. all she does is just complain about how shitty the job was, and how the boss doesnt treat her well and how she cant stand "arrogant asses" and so on. a lot of people are keen to leave her be, and treat her with kid gloves and wine her up a bit. the man she falls in love with provides her with all the love she's been yearning for, things just dont seem to have gone her way, so she takes it out on him, she goes after a guy and goes very hard, the guy doesnt accept her, she threatens to leave him unless he takes her out on a date, she just doesnt seem to understand the way things are around her. if she is so unhappy, she could easily just try to fix things herself and not throw a tantrum and threaten to leave him. but she never tries anything. instead, she gets into a verbal battle with a guy over whether he loves her or not. he wants her to remain with him, and i guess that is what she cant bear, she dumps him, then dumps the studio and keeps herself to herself. by the time she is finally in treatment, she is in no state to even try to work. she ends up falling in love with abhis, even though he has clearly forgotten that they had a relationship, the movie tries to justify it, by saying that she doesnt want to be his burden. but the film doesnt explain why she doesnt want to be his burden and why a burden should be reason for you to end up in love. we see how he treats her, and this is because the film has made the assumption that she is some sort of heartless person who doesn't deserve any sympathy. but it is the film which needs to justify itself.

the mixture of humour and poignancy in this movie is magical. the ability to make me guestion my own opinions about the industry, and about so many films, on so many levels is part of what makes a truly great movie. it never ceased to amaze me how adeptly akshay roy uses his filmmaking skills to narrate this story, and what he has been able to do with the footage he has taken from the work of a director who has been made to virtually disappear. if this film fails to do that, it has failed miserably in its attempts. this is a movie that reminds you that even if your own life is nowhere near as significant as yours is in the film, you can still be moved by it. you wont find it in a lot of films. this is the kind of film that lets you believe that life is just that way, and that we are all so insignificant anyway, the contrast between the whole idea of the movie (abhimanyu and his brother trying to help out a young girl) and the manner in which it is enacted, just takes you out of your seat. you have to stop and marvel, you can understand why it would have attracted great name recognition. i might have liked it more as a throwaway movie, but that is an observation. i believe that filmmaking cannot survive with its being a sport. it is after all, a craft, and art. it is a take on life, and that will always be different. so i prefer films that take a risk, that challenge me to think differently. but then, i am a film blogger, and this is what i do. its my job. so to hell with critics! but i cant help feel a sense of regret, knowing that if i were to now watch this movie, this is the film where i would feel its power. i would end up talking about how brilliant it is, instead of being able to just review it for what it is. 5ec8ef588b
